

I support the Indiana do not call law because it is restrictive, and I don't want calls from any business soliciting me to buy something. I do not believe they should have a right to call and try and sell me something just because I had dealt with them in the past. I am upset that Consumers Banker Association (CBA) is trying to weaken that law by allowing exemptions for so called business relationships. They are fully aware that people can't exist in isolation and must deal with some businesses, especially banks, on a regular basis. They are just using this as another attempt to invade my privacy to make a sales call and earn more money for themselves. My telephone is for my convenience, not some instrument that any business can use to invade my privacy!
